a speech delivered by zimmermann upon his receiving the dr leopold lucas prize for the year 2002 printed in english and german on opposite pages deplores the historiographic neglect of the calamitous fate of german jewry during the war period part of the reason is perhaps that for germans including german historians it was too disturbing to consider the murder of their own neighbors whereas israeli historians are oriented toward studying eastern european jewry german jews made up only about 2 of all european jews but the process of their annihilation was in many ways distinctive and requires a historiography of its own yet in the context of the general history of the holocaust or of the jews in germany the topic is usually considered briefly if at all more is to be found in accounts of specific aspects e g economic or cultural in survivors memoirs and in local studies but a comprehensive monograph is lacking also argues that the association of nazism solely with auschwitz deprives us of lessons on racism and antisemitism that can be learned from its earlier stages ever since w e b du bois conceptualized slaves self emancipation during the u s civil war as a general strike the language of labor history has informed scholarly understandings of slavery while the analogy of the plantation to the factory has its obvious limitations historians have understood slaves and slaveholders as engaged in recognizable struggles over the speed of work the ownership of time and expertise and the informal rights and privileges that governed the labor process however an older materialist history rooted in marxist categories has not always succeeded in capturing the dynamics of racial dominance and human commodification at the heart of the american slave system a new history of capitalism has offered one remedy namely to embed slavery firmly within a capitalist mode of production whose investment in free labor was always more rhetorical than real a different response may now be emerging through what scholars call the new materialism an approach organized around human non human entanglements and drawing on recent theoretical work on things networks and assemblages this talk considers the implications of this new materialism for the history of slavery and by extension for the field of labor history more generally
