what makes us believe anything told to us by another person how does this work in scenes of judgment where we operate almost exclusively with report from others like a trial by jury thomas reid declared in 1785 that we give the name of evidence to whatever is a ground of belief and such defining formulations both echo and were echoed by seminal writings on the law of evidence the ideas of belief and evidence have depended upon each other for a very long time belief in evidence traces the relationship between these terms as they expressed themselves in british evidence
