The Solution The Comprehensive Peace Accord and its Key Provisions 2 The Comprehensive Peace Accord CPA signed in 2006 aimed to address these core problems. The agreement, a landmark achievement in Nepal's history, focused on several key areas: Ceasefire and Demobilization. The agreement established a ceasefire between the government and the Maoist rebels, followed by the managed demobilization and integration of Maoist combatants into the national army and civilian life. This process, though initially challenging, has progressed significantly, albeit with ongoing debates on the verification and management of former combatants. The CPA mandated the establishment of a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) and a Commission of Investigation on Enforced Disappeared Persons (CIEDP) to investigate human rights abuses committed during the conflict. The effectiveness of these commissions has been debated, with criticisms raised about their slow progress and lack of accountability. The accord paved the way for the drafting of a new constitution that addressed the demands of various ethnic and marginalized groups, promoting inclusivity and federalism. The constitution adopted in 2015 is a significant step towards addressing historical grievances and promoting political stability. Source: Cite research on Nepal's 2015 Constitution and its impact. Economic Development and Reconstruction. The CPA highlighted the need for substantial investments in rebuilding infrastructure, promoting economic growth, and creating job opportunities. However, progress in this area has been inconsistent, hampered by bureaucratic hurdles and a lack of adequate funding. Source: Cite World Bank or UN Development Program reports on Nepal's economic development. Ongoing Challenges and Future Prospects. Despite significant progress, numerous challenges remain. Justice and Accountability: The slow progress of the TRC and CIEDP continues to fuel resentment and hinders reconciliation. The lack of accountability for past human rights abuses undermines the credibility of the peace process. Political Polarization: Deep-seated political divisions persist, hindering effective policy implementation and long-term stability. The frequent changes in government further complicate efforts to address critical issues. Economic Disparity: Significant economic inequality continues to be a major source of social unrest, especially in rural areas. Addressing this disparity requires sustained investment in education, healthcare, and infrastructure development. Ethnic Tensions: While the constitution attempted to address ethnic diversity, tensions still persist, particularly regarding issues of autonomy and resource allocation. Corruption: Persistent corruption within government institutions undermines public trust and hinders effective governance. Expert
