excerpt from greece and the aegean islands what follows makes no pretense whatever of being a scientific work on greece from an archaeological or other standpoint that it is written at all is the resultant of several forces chief among which are the consciousness that no book hitherto published so far as i am aware has covered quite the same ground and the feeling based on the experience of myself and others that some such book ought to be available by way of explanation and apology i am forced to admit even to myself that what i have written especially in the opening chapters is liable to the occasional charge that it has a guide bookish sound despite an honest and persistent effort to avoid the
